Reflection

Upon completing my personal website, I am quite pleased with the outcome—it stands as a testament to the knowledge I've amassed throughout the course. The site is tailored to my initial vision, serving as a professional portfolio that I can present to potential employers. However, the journey to this point has been a delicate balancing act between exercising my creative impulses and adhering to the stringent grading rubrics of the assignments.

The constraints of academic grading have, admittedly, somewhat curtailed my creative expression. I found myself making decisions based not solely on what would best showcase my capabilities or aesthetic preferences, but also on what would secure the best marks. This academic exercise, while valuable, has certainly provided a different experience compared to what I would have encountered in a real-world scenario.

Should I decide to employ this website as a part of my professional toolkit, some refinement would be in order. I would like to adjust the code to ensure that the website serves more as a showcase of my skills and achievements, and less as an artifact that simply meets course requirements. Nevertheless, the project has been an informative one, offering me a clearer perspective on web design and development, and undoubtedly contributing to my growth as a budding professional in the tech industry.